Cause of General Jackson's Death, [From the Old Dominion for March.] Editors of Old Dominion:

I have just received your letter asking me to give you some information in regard to the last wound of General Jackson, that you may correct the statement published in some Northern magazines by Gen. De Peyster and Colonel Clifford Thomson. The former, you say, claims that General Jackson was shot by the 1st Massachusetts infantry, and the latter that he was killed by a canister shot from Pleasanton's artillery.

You will find an accurate account of the General's last wound and death in Dabney's "Life of Jackson," or in the account I wrote and published several years ago.

The facts are briefly these: General Jackson made the attack May 2d with his army in three lines of battle. Rhodes' Division occupied the front line, Colston's Division the second line, and Hill, with a part of his Division in line and a part in column, the third line. During the attack and rapid pursuit of the enemy Rhodes' and Colston's Divisions became commingled and moved in one confused mass. Rhodes finding how disordered the troops were, asked Jackson to send Hill forward to take the advance, and permit the first and second lines to be reformed. While this was being done, Jackson, accompanied by some officers and couriers, rode forward to re-connoitre. He advanced as far as the Federal pickets, and then turned to come back to his own line, when his party, mistaken for Federal cavalry, were fired into by the Confederate line of battle. The fire was probably from troops who had just been placed in position, and who did not know that Jackson and his party were in front of them. I think this was the General's impression in speaking of it afterwards. Several of his party were killed and wounded by this fire, but the General escaped. and turning to his left entered the forest and continued to approach his own line. When wichto thirty or forty yards of it a second volley was fired, which wounded him in three places. One of the wounds was in the right hand, the other two in his lett arm. The ball causing the first wound lodged under the skin upon the back of his hand. It was a round ball, such as was used for the smooth-bore Springfield ed with smooth-bore muskets. I will add that General Jackson did not die from these wounds. His death was the result of pneumonia, and occurred eight days after the wounds were received.

muskets. The wounds in his left arm were believed to have been made by the same kind of bullets. The Confederate troops who fired the volleys at the General and his escort were arm-

Scene in New York .- On Friday afternoon, as Justice Hogan was about to leave his court room in the Tombs, the gentlemanly clerk called his attention to a forlorn and dilapidated colored man. The poor old colored man was nearly seventy years of age, and was quite lame. He had an old slouched hat wrapped about the head of his cane, and his hair, moustache, and eye-brows were as white as the driven suow. Hobbling to the outer railing he looked at the judge, while his palsied hands were shaking on his stick, and his bent body was quivering with decrepitude. It was some time before he could speak. At length in choking accents, he said :

"Judge, 1--1-1'se an ole man. I'se way down from Alb'marle county, Varginny-dar's what I'se from. De ole mass', and an' de boys, an' my son Pete, and all de little nigs am scattered by de wah, an' de ole man's in a strange lan', Judge-iu a strange lan'!"

Here the poor old man dropped his hat from the top of his cane, and wiped a tear from his eye with the back of his shrivelled hand. The Judge, becoming interested, told the old man to go on with his story, saying that he had some friends in Albemarle county, and asked if he knew any of the Tollivers. The old darkey brightened up and said: Yes, yes, indeed; de ole Mass' Tolliver won de great Alb, marle cock fight nigh onto forty year ago. You 'member dat cock fight Judge?

The Judge laughed, and said that that was before his time. The old man stooped and picked up his felt hat with a great deal of difficulty, after which he drew a long breath, and hobbled closer to the Judge's desk. "Ah, does Tolliver chick'ns had de shuah blood, Judge, an'all de gemmens was ateard on'em. Did ye eber see any of dem birds what de ole Mass' Tolliver had, Judge?"

"No, no, uncle," replied the Judge, "that was before my time." "Yes, yes," pensively said the old darkey "dat was a long time agone, for shuah-dat great Alb'marle cock fight-dat was in de ole Jackson and de Henry Clay time. Does ye remember does times, Judge?" The Judge assured the old man that he did not, and asked him what he could do for him. The tears again started to his eyes, and in a trembling voice hessid:

"Yes, yes, Judge. Ye see I'se an ole nigger—a poor ole nigger; an' mass, an' de boys, an' Pete-dat's my son-an' all de litte nigs am scattered by de wah, an' de ole man's in a strange lan.' And de ele man's hungry an' cole. An' de ole man's trens say for him to cum down to de Judge, and de Judge would gib 'em a commit to de island, whar de ole man he cold sleep an'eat until dem warm days would come again.
